

An Absolute Rake; or, ball games, vice & musick (feat. early modern dance at Sadlers Wells) (Before Kings Cross St Pancras Book 2)

The second volume in the local history series Before Kings Cross St Pancras, the Absolute Rake of the title was Charles Eaton, the late C17 landlord of a tavern and bowling greens in the fields of London that survives to this day as a popular pub. A gambler, gangster, pimp, bully and highwayman, Eaton was famous also for solo performances in the musick houses, fairgrounds and theatres of a macho country dance, the Cheshire Round. With his exact contemporary the poetaster journalist Ned Ward (aka the London Spy) as guide (and with a helping hand from, among others, the journalist and novelist-to-be Daniel Defoe), the tale describes the culture and sports of the suburbs of London and their neighbouring fields at a time of revolutionary change, the capital expanding rapidly and its inhabitants inventing many of the features that would become the foundations of the modern global world. Drawing its population from across the British Isles and the continent it was from a common European musical and theatrical heritage going back for more than a millennium that Londons licensed and irregular stages forged the English pantomime and ballet, an absolute rake investigating the part played by the newly opened and now world famous Sadlers Wells in their development.
