

Key Concepts for Protecting Patentable Inventions for Small & Medium Sized Businesses Under the AIA

Authored by Dale Carlson, Partner at Wiggin & DanaThe America Invents Act (AIA), recently signed into law by President Obama, has key substantive features that will be implemented during 2013. Although touted during hearings on The Hill as leveling the playing field for all patent applicants, the AIA clearly favors big businesses having sophisticated patent departments capable of wending their way through the myriad of pitfalls introduced by the legislation. The legislation is noteworthy for its length and complexity. Its wording is barely comprehensible even to patent experts, much less individual entrepreneurs, and heads of small to medium-sized businesses. If you are one of the latter individuals, what must you do now in order to allow your business to have a sensible stake in the new game of patent roulette? If you cant afford to hire your own patent team, then you must at a minimum read an overview of the legislation, make a list of action items, and stick to the list. During my career spanning three decades in patent practice, Ive been in-counsel to two major companies (Union Carbide Corporation and Olin Corporation), and outside counsel to a variety of large, small and medium-sized chemical companies. Ive learned how big companies behave in developing and enforcing their patent portfolios, and how the smaller companies must respond in order to survive and thrive.
