

Penrod (Start Classics)

Penrod sat morosely upon the back fence and gazed with envy at Duke, his wistful dog. A bitter soul dominated the various curved and angular surfaces known by a careless world as the face of Penrod Schofield. Except in solitude, that face was almost always cryptic and emotionless; for Penrod had come into his twelfth year wearing an expression carefully trained to be inscrutable. Since the world was sure to misunderstand everything, mere defensive instinct prompted him to give it as little as possible to lay hold upon. Nothing is more impenetrable than the face of a boy who has learned this, and Penrod was habitually as fathomless as the depth of his hatred this morning for the literary activities of Mrs. Lora Rewbushan almost universally respected fellow citizen, a lady of charitable and poetic inclinations, and one of his own mothers most intimate friends. Mrs. Lora Rewbush had written something which she called The Childrens Pageant of the Table Round, and it was to be performed in public that very afternoon at the Womens Arts and Guild Hall for the benefit of the Coloured Infants Betterment Society. And if any flavour of sweetness remained in the nature of Penrod Schofield after the dismal trials of the school-week just past, that problematic, infinitesimal remnant was made pungent acid by the imminence of his destiny to form a prominent feature of the spectacle, and to declaim the loathsome sentiments of a character named upon the programme the Child Sir Lancelot.
