Excerpt: ... CHAPTER III. THE TUTOR. There was no counting now on Lord Ormonts presence in the British gathering seasons, when wheatears wing across our fields or swallows return to their eaves. He forsook the hunt to roam the Continent, one of the vulgar band of tourists, honouring town only when May-flies had flown, and Londons indiscriminate people went about without their volatile heads. Lady Charlotte put these changed conditions upon the behaviour of the military authorities to her brother; saying that the wonder was he did not shake the dust of his country from his feet. In her wise head she rejoiced to think he was not the donkey she sketched for admiration; and she was partly consoled, or played at the taking of a comfort needed in her perpetual struggle with a phantom of a fact, by the reflection that a young woman on his arm would cause him to feel himself more at home abroad. Her minds habit of living warmly beside him in separation was vexed by the fixed intrusion of a female third person, who checked the run of intimate chatter, especially damped the fancied talk over early days--of which the creature was ignorant; and her propinquity to him arrested or broke the dialogue Lady Charlotte invented and pressed to renew. But a wife, while letting him be seen, would have insisted on appropriating the thought of him--all his days, past as well as present. An impassioned sisters jealousy preferred that it should not be a wife reigning to dispute her share of her brother in imagination. Then came a rumour, telling of him as engaged upon the composition of his Memoirs. Lady Charlottes impulsive outcry: Writing them? signified her grounds for alarm. Happily,

Memoirs are not among the silly deeds done in a moment; they were somewhere ahead and over the hills...
