

The Soane Hogarths

A Rakes Progress (1734-5) and An Election (1755) are the most famous of William Hogarths series of 39 modern moral subjects. The two series were purchased in the early nineteenth century by the architect Sir John Soane who regarded them as amongst his greatest treasures. In this book Christina Scull sets the paintings in the context of Hogarths life and times and of his other moral series A Harlots Progress and Marriage A-la-mode and gives a detailed account of their narrative and contents. The eight paintings of A Rakes Progress and the four paintings of An Election are all illustrated in colour together with many of the engravings - authorised as well as pirate editions - based on them. Since this volume was first published in 1991, the celebrity status of the Soane Hogarths has continued to grow. In 1997 A Rakes Progress featured in a special exhibition at Sir John Soanes Museum together with the precursors and successors of Hogarths great social satire. The crowds flocked to the Gallery and the catalogue sold out within weeks. In 2001 General Election year in Britain An Election was given its own show which proved a soothing tonic for a nation weary of politicians and their antics.
