

Infringement Indemnity Provisions for Software Licensing

About the eBook Software applications play a major role in the day-to-day business operation of almost all companies. Although the magnitude of risk may vary, licensees face exposure to unwanted infringement liability from applications ranging from large proprietary enterprise resource planning (ERP) systems to simple utilities that produce fonts and other graphics. In years past, purchasing a software platform did not automatically carry with it a huge bulls-eye for potential infringement claims. In recent years, however, the proliferation of non-practicing entities, affectionately referred to as patent trolls, means that no one is safe from the threat of costly patent litigation. In the past, software companies with all but the mightiest of leverage would typically take full responsibility for infringement based on the use of their products. Today, many software companies are taking a step back, treating the patent troll infringement risk as the product of flaws in our patent system. Some software providers justifiably feel that this risk should be born equally by licensees.
