Not illustrated. 1830 edition. Excerpt: ...or to start aside, astonished and dismayed, on hearing the captain consign himself, or some other person or persons unknown, to the deuce, in very unequivocal terms, or announce, in a tone of jocular familiarity, the arrival of a brother officer in that place which the dean or we never mention to ears polite; or, in short, any of those little violation of prevailing taste, which might lie reasonably objected to in the works of professed authors. With these limitations, however, we doubt not they will find the Adventures in the Rifle Briirade, a pleasant, rolkking, slapdash sort of journal enough; witness the description of tho field of Waterloo, during and after the battle: I had never yet heard of a battle in which very body was killed (it is dear the author is scandalously ignorant of the well authenticated conflict of the Kilkenny cats); but this seemed likely to be an exception, as nil were going by turns. We got excessively impatient under the taine similitude of the latter part of the process, and burned with desire to have a last thrust at our respective vit-a-vii; for, however desperate our affairs were, we had still the satisfaction of seeing that theirs were worse. Sir John Laralert continued to stand as our siiport, at the head of three tfood old regiments, one dead (the twenty-seventh) and two living ones; and we took the liberty of soliciting him to aid our views; but the Pukes orders on that head were Bo very particular that the gallant general had no choice. Presently a cheer, which we knew to be British, commenced far to the right, and made every one prick up his enrs;--it was Lord Wellingtons long wished-for orders to advance; it gradually approached, growing louder as it...
