Not illustrated. 1918 edition. Excerpt: ...nt he flirt with Lady Mount-Rhyswicke? He was thoroughly happy; his Helene, his belle Marquise, sat across the table from him sending messages to him with her eyes. He adored her, but he liked Lady Mount-Rhyswicke--he liked everybody and everything in the world. He liked Pedlow particularly, and it no longer troubled him that the fat man should be a friend of Madame de Vaurigard. Pedlow was a character and a wit as well. Mellin laughed heartily at everything the Honorable Chandler Pedlow said. This is life, remarked the young man to his fair neighbor. What is? Sittin round a table, eatin and drinkin? Ah, lovely skeptic! She looked at him strangely, but he continued with growing enthusiasm: I mean to sit at such a table as this, with such a chef, with such wines--to know one crowded hour like this is to live! Not a thing is missing; all this swagger furniture, the rich atmosphere of smartness about the whole place; best of all, the company. Its a great thing to have the real people around you, the right sort, you know, socially; people you d ask to your own table at home. There are only seven, but every one distingue, every one She leaned both elbows on the table with her hands palm to palm, and, resting her cheek against the back of her left hand, looked at him steadily. And you--are you distinguished, too? Oh, I would nt be much known over here, he said modestly. Do you write poetry? Oh, not professionally, though it is published. I suppose--he sipped his champagne with his head a little to one side as though judging its quality--I suppose I ve been more or less a dilettante. I Ve knocked about the world a good bit....
