

Excerpt from The Wicker Work Woman: A Chronicle of Our Times In his study M. Bergeret, professor of literature at the University, was preparing his lesson on the eighth book of the Iliad to the shrill mechanical accompaniment of the piano, on which, close by, his daughters were practising a difficult exercise. M. Bergerets room possessed only one window, but this was a large one, and filled up one whole side. It admitted, however, more draught than light, for the sashes were ill-fitting and the panes darkened by a high contiguous wall. M. Bergerets table, pushed close against this window, caught the dismal rays of niggard daylight that filtered through.
